

Today we conclude our analysis with a reflection that unfolds along two axis:

- care
- celebration

As we said, care is "cura" in Latin. Celebration, in the other hand, could mean "festa", like holiday celebration.

The two words are fundamental in life and economics, as there is no care without celebration, and viceversa.

Thus, we find care at the center of economics and religious life, and we find celebration as a ? economic category and every religion. Capitalism tries to transform "festa" into paid entertainment.

We start with care. We remember Heidegger's care definition, with it being the fundamental way through which human beings deal with others and things. When it's about things, we take care of them, so our manipulation is more intrusive. When it comes to people, we have care instead of taking care of them. Having care is something that respect the others. There is a deep relationship between spirituality and care, and there is a necessary relationship between language and words of care, and language and words of religious spiritual life.

Remember also the relationship of the world temple with "tempio" and "tempo". The time we access to when we get in a temple is kind of suspended, not following the efficiency and rationality of outside the temple. We can contemplate, and be masters of our time. We have the possibility to travel and float in a non-productive time, not oriented towards any purpose. The experience of the temple makes no sense unless we make space in us for the "lichtung", that means illumination and lightining, illuminating the part of the wood where the trees are not dense. It makes us capable of breaking the laws of rational time. The spiritual experience needs this liberation of time, fundamental to experience care.

Care is a realm where we have another way of considering time, as the modes of care are not those of ordinary life, of the world of networks, etc.

When we come back from the office for example, and we play with our children, we should leave behind the register and rhythm of efficiency, and enter in a world governed by another law and sense of time. If there is no time, there is no care, and we remained tracked within a fragmented time preventing us from enjoying a broader free time.

When we listen to our grandfather or sick relative, and speak them with care, we realise that we start to tune into another rhythm.

Care is one of the greatest name (?) of gift, as there is no care without gratuity.

Care is also professionalism, with training on a specific field.

One of the misunderstanding of our age has been to associate gift ("for free") with the concept of "gratis" ("not for a fee"). This misconception derives from the idea that if an increase in gift implied a decrease in due payment, as if there is some kind of game where the more gratuitness there is in a act, the less we should pay for it.

If there is one fundamental characteristic of gift is this ambivalence. Gift is among the highest things in life, but it could become a means of manipulation.

In particular, it had never been all equal. For example, those celebrated in public sphere always involved reciprocity. Gifts were made to the influencers and rich people, tributing important figures, like a king, and in return we would expect praises and recognition.

The situation was radically opposed when gifts took place within domestic walls. Here gifts were no less than those occurring in public, and the value was equal or greater. Domestic labor was not recognised as a gift, and the name gift assumed was duty and obligation. The actors of sacrifice were generally man, while the actors of gift and obligation were women.

In traditional culture, glory belonged to men.

How many statues of women we have in Rome for example? Most of them are wives, or saints. The first act of women subjugation and obligation was the denial and no recognition of gift.

When we say that we considered duty as an obligation, we mean that we interpreted it (????).

A similar discourse may be made regarding sacrifices: those offered to God produce credit for those who were making them. Sacrifices made in public, like in industries, produce wages, but the only sacrifices made by women were considered duty and obligation, considered as a constant debt.

Only in this way we can understand the possibility of entering general labour market meant for women in the 20th century.

The salary of these women working (employees, teachers) differed from their husbands, and it also had a flavour and colour of reciprocity that were not the flavours and colours women were used to within their homes.

The mutual advantage lying ... were not the same rules animating relationships between men and women.

Why care works continues to be underpaid compared to other jobs? We cannot understand why a nurse is paid hundreds less than a manager, unless we dive deeply. Cleaning and cooking were once tasks reserved to servants and slaves, mothers and sisters, and never to men or wealthy women. We considered care activity as a form assigned to slaves and poor women. There is an elite of women who refers more to their husbands rather than servants.

The care market then emerged.

If we were to image a 21th century where all the care is entrusted to the market, we would indulge in an amplification of inequalities.

Care jobs are fully paid as they're associated to the idea of sacrifice and duty as an obligation.

Care is an indispensable dimension of every human life, or we couldn't be here. Being competent in care is not considered as a value, as the economics has been constructed around the figure of "homo economicus", lying in efficiency.

Economy was not conceived as a sphere where the dimension of relationship was truly essential. Even today when women reach the highest level of business, this dimension is hardly questioned. On the contrary, people adapt and conform, conceding organisations according to a masculine canon.

If the market must manage all demands for care, it would do that according to some law. Efficiency, speed and competition sneak in our homes and families, destroying what remains of the familiar times of care, as people are no longer able to change their register from business to family. Perhaps, when we visit our parents, we're always in rush, not spending time listenign to them. We cannot tune ourselves into another rhythm, as we're still in a register where time is money and no gift.

While economy value increase when we reduce the time employed, the time of care increase along the invested time: the more we invest, the greater is its value, opposite to what corporate world teaches people to do.

Let's consider now "festa", celebration. It requires care and labour, and care requires celebration. Capitalistic religion, in the other hand, seeks to abolish celebration, by filling networks and markets with an explosion of entertainment, that have nothing in common with the experience of celebration.

There is a cerative destruction of communities, destrying traditional communities, and offering paid substitutes in their place. The same applies to celebration, as free celebration is destroyed, and its place we have entertainment.

Celebration can only be co-consumed together with others, and must remain outside the economic register.

There is a radical tendency in our time to reduce celebration, as it an uncomfortable matter for capitalism, as it's unmanageable and eccessive. It's not meritocratic, and pervaded by gratuitness.

It's hated by capitalism, and consumers product are replacing it.

Though, it's a primary human need. It's also "a friend of work", as those who work loves celebration, and those who do not know work, do not know celebration either.

It's the rhythm of work raising celebration and viceversa.

The value of celebration in the Bible is contained in many realities, but above all in the value of "domenica" ("sunday"), where "dominus" means "padrone". God itself, in order to celebrate, he needs to wait the end of celebration, as even ...

Nobody, not even God, can celebrate alone. If its true that celebration is God's great gift to human, it's equally true that its a gift of reciprocity.

Therefore, the message contained whithin the idea of sacred days, removed from time and logic of the world, dedicated to contemplation, is hateful to capitalism.

The capitalistic slogan of I can do anything I can do, claims our despise for limits.

Celebration reminds us that we're not the master of the world, as we inhabit it, and allows us to live, but we're only guests.

The earth is not our object of possessions, animals are not created for us.

Connected to the culture of the day of rest ("sunday"), it's also the culture of fallow weed, an expression derived from the month of may, where in the roman world the cultivated fields were left at rest in may.

This is not only an agricultural technique, but it's also a rule of life, and it may be summarised this way. We may use the land for six days, not the seventh.

The foreigner is not such every day, as on the seventh day is a member of the community in celebration.

There is a portion of our goods and land that is not ours, that we must leave for others.

A significant component of responsibility for the degradation of our time and environment comes from the forgetting of this rule.

Recognising that there exists a dimension of non-ownership of the earth, means affirming we're not predators of the planet. We should invent thus a non-predatory relationship with the planet, enhanced with the spirit of "gratuitness".

The struggle between this capitalism and celebration is deep and radical, as large corportations tries to recreate the symbolic force of celebration, yet the work culture of previous century was created by secular celebrations, like wedding, baptism.

The consumeristic culture of contemporary capitalism is stripping away the spiritual form (??).

The symbols of celebration without the popular gratuitous element produce only monstrous creatures.

Celebration in capitalism do not derive from gratuitousness, but from interest.

Gratuitousness express a profound desire for justice.

Utopias could be understood as "eu-topia", where "topos" means place, and the "eu" could be the contraction of two vocals, if we're dealing with eutopia we mean that it's a place we aspire to go, while with outopia we mean no place. In this ambuiguity of the root, we can decide what way we can think.
