

Others who co-constitute our existential experience, contribute to form our background of meanings we've inherited. As the presence of others is necessary and inescapable, we've also seen the darker side of this phenomenon.

In this case, co-forming our identity, is about entering in contact with others, forming conversations, exchanging information, can run the risk of con-forming to others, undergoing to a process of levelling produced by this mediacy (averageness).

We must identify how this happens, the forms where the dictatorship of "das man" takes place in everyday life.

Heidegger sees, in these 3 forms, the manifestation of the dictatorship:

- "la chiacchera"
- the curiosity
- ambiguity ("l'equivoco").

These concepts will help us to interpret present times as tools.

Let's begin with the first one. Heidegger identifies the mode of being and understanding and interpretation of das man. Human beings express themselves through words and languages, trying to express his own meaning.

However, once words are pronounced, they are entrusted to the hearing of the other, which is not merely listening, but also understanding.

Let's deal with the concept of interpretation.

We can grasp it well if we consider the musical interpretation. In the interpretation of a text, or a musical piece, the personality of the interpreter is central. Through his own sensitivity he colours with an additional meaning what he has to interpret. He provides an intensity, a vibration allowing us to say "listening to a certain way of playing a piece ...".

Language therefore contains a series of interpretative layers, that at the same time reveal certain meanings and conceal others.

Through the hermeneutics method, we become aware of the plasticity of meaning. In relation to this scenario, the mutual exchange of meanings, hypothesis, senses, the averageness of das man acts differently. Thanks to the average understanding offered by the dictatorship, we're relieved of the burden of deep understanding, and we can count on the availability of answers already available.

Language no longer preserves the horizon of meanings, but to preserve "the identical", identical sense according to the conforming power.

Things will have to be understood by everyone in the identical way.

The discourse of averageness does not seek the original meaning of what is being discussed, rather it's interested in the dissemination of spreading and repeating the discourse itself in wider cycles ("becoming viral today"). "Things are so as they're what is being said".

From this expansion, "chatter" and "rumours" gain an authority.

This authority is not truly authoritative, as the original uncertainty of its foundation as the phenomenon grows larger becomes aggravated until it turns into groundlessness. Even if this average discourse impose itself in our interpretation and understanding, the fact that it's not founded on anything, as it grows bigger and larger, this lack of foundation turns into groundlessness. Nevertheless, the groundlessness of chatter is not an obstacle to public diffusion, favouring it instead. This idle talk is the possibility of discussing about everything, without making the effort to understanding it.

Small talk not only exempts us from the task of authentic understanding, but also spreads in a dimension where nothing is truly inaccessible.

For Heidegger, chatter does not have a negative meaning, and is not the result of deception, however unlike the genuine discourse and dialogue (with answering, analyzing), is not interested in what it's traced back to its foundation, being a closure.

The dialogue is intended to discover these different layers of meaning, trying to "ex-plain", opening possible new meanings. The small talk, differently, not pursuing any intent to open up, is a closure. This closure is aggravated by the fact that chatter, presuming to have achieved a complete understanding of a topic, prevents any new examination or discussion on it, considering them irrelevant. Heidegger affirms that this interpretative situation established by the chatter, is established in dasein.

We try to understand deeply only a few things in our life. For the most things, we try to understand them through an average interpretation.

This dasein thus remains in a state of suspension. In this state, dasein still relates to the world and himself, but only on the surface, comforted and protected by the obviousness of its interpretative state, being also the public one.

Lingering in this state of understanding and not understanding, dasein never experience the uncanniness and disorientation that the groundlessness of its conviction ? to provoke. he is comforted by the fact that it's a public interpretation, and that what he says through chatter is groundless, dasein provokes its uncanniness, living in a comfort place.

Dasein neither seeks deeper, nor rise higher. Immersed in this averageness, dasein can only float.

This was the first mode of being average in everydayness (coming from german word ?).

The second mode is expressed in what Heidegger defines "curiosity".

The word curiosity contains a root referring to "cure", "care", but to a degenerate kind of caring. Behind our taking care of things, and caring for others, there is a mode of being of dasein, tending to seek what is far away in order to bring it closer.

When we take care of things, and have care of others, we're busy. We do something, and we're engaged in it. When this type of care finishes, either happens because it's finished its mission, or it's slowing down to rest. When the care arrests, we still have this way of behaving that is inner, so we address our care towards over things, to curiosity. What curiosity seeks is not true knowledge, rather a way of letting away the world pressure, taking a refugee elsewhere.

Curiosity does not care of see to understand, but only to see. It seeks the novelty as a spring board towards new things, trying to avoid boredom. What matters in this kind of vision is not understanding, but merely the possibility of abandoning ourself to the world, giving up to our interests.

Curiosity does not stop, it's like a bee going from one flower to another. It does not seek the calm of the contemplation, being dominated by restlessness driving the world to change.

In order to know something, we have to stop, establish a relation with what we want to understand. Curiosity is not the purpose of knowing something, and in this permanent state of agitation curiosity seeks the possibility of distraction.

To "distract", means "tra-here" in another way, turning our head towards something else. "Di-version", as turning our head and thoughts from the hearth topic, to the small one.

Curiosity is not founded in wonder, surprise. There is no amazement before what is understood, as it's purpose is to know, but only to be able to say that one has known.

These two parts of curiosity, inability to dwell and distraction in what is new, ground the "restlessness". Curiosity is everywhere and nowhere, therefore originally rootless.

What mechanism is behind these three elements that sets these three phenomenon in motion? The small talk guides curiosity and tells it what one must have read or seen. Curiosity, instead, being everywhere and nowhere is entrusted to the small talk. These two modes of everyday being, one concerning the small talk, and other the curiosiness, must nevertheless be considered in their uniqueness.

Curiosity, for which not is secret, and small talk, ?, induce dasein to believe that he's leading a well-lived life. This presumption reveals a third characteristic in his everyday life: misunderstanding. If everything is accessible to everyone, it will soon no longer be possible to distinguish what has already been understood and what not.

This presumption of knowledge shows us the disengagement of average, laziness, that does not truly want to know and understand, rather spreads around what has been said beforehand. The small talk is even irritated, if what it has anticipated eventually becomes real, as it deprives from the opportunity to continue anticipating.

The ambiguity that characterizes the state of average makes speaking in advance and curious anticipation the authentic reality, discretizing the dimension of understanding as secondary and uninteresting.

Misunderstanding gives idle talk that everything is decided by it (?).

In this description, everyone keeps an eye on other, to see how he will behave and what he will say. Being together, dominated by the dictatorship of man, is not means the juxtaposition of ?, but is an ambiguous watching, and a hidden mutual listening.

This commensuration thus becomes hidden.

In this situation is revealed a fundamental mode, the "dejection" ("deiezione").

We're encountering again the root of "iacere" (?), seen in the thrownness and in the project.

In dejection, we're not thrown into the world, neither throwing a project. It's the state of identification of being with others dominated by curiosity and misunderstanding, which we define as inauthenticity.

In authenticity, dasein is stunned by the world and by being with others. Instead of seeking his own form, he rather conforms to others. Idle talk, induces in dasein the illusion of ?

The security and the ease of das man spread towards an authentic understanding. In this state, dasein might be led to believe he's living a full life, inducing him in a state of tranquillity, where one imagines that everything is going in the best way. Yet, this tranquillity of inauthentic being is constantly threatened by an uneasiness, prevents from being full, and has no peace. Instead, it's translated into frenzy and hyperactivity.

Dasein creates the opportunity to misunderstand, tempting himself to the inauthenticity. From one side, this temptation allows dasein to feel reassured, but also feeling that something is wrong, and authentic possibilities are misunderstood, therefore being alienated. Since we cannot determine what is authentic for us, recurring to what das man says for us, we live in a state of imprisonment.

How can dasein emerge from this vortex of inauthenticity? It's "uncksht" ???, the anguish. What is the difference between fear and anguish? Fear, differently from anguish, is always a fear of something. By fearing something that comes closer, I try to move away from this being. We always have fear of something. Anguish, however, cannot spot anything to stop by. In the state of anguish, is not a certain object that makes me fearful, rather being in the world as such, and the possibility of no longer being, is what causes me the anguish.

When we escape, we escape from ourselves. It's indeterministic. The fact that we cannot see what is making us feel it this way, makes it even more dangerous, as we don't know where to go.

While, when we are fearful, we try to divert towards something else, in the state of anguish everything loses its importance, being nothing that can give us relief, known as "l'impertinenza del nulla".

The subject, which was supposed to be the ground on which all the metaphysics was placed on... Not only we're not subjects, but at the same time under our feet there is an abyss. This abyss is called "ab-grund", "no ground". It's the depth of nothingness. How do we perceive that? If it's true what we've said, that dasein has as one of the main characteristics the possibility to be, then if we're here we had to make some choices.

Right around all the possibilities I have accomplished, the abyss of all those possibilities that we're not realized and never do, open up and makes me feel anguish, until even the very possibility of my own being will be taken away by the realization of the most certain possibility, death.

Faced with the robbery of nothingness, I realize that the threatening comes from nowhere, but still is present, and in anguish this threatening does not need to approach from outside, as it's already here with me.

The fact that everything that exists, things, etc., the insignificance that we perceive in anguish, is not the same as saying the world disappears. The oppression of this state of anguish does not arise from this or that situation, but from the fact the world loses as a whole its meaning. When this state of anguish fades away, the discourse of awareness of das man, in reality was nothing (??). Although the dictatorship is aimed to cover things over, in this case it hits the mark.

We've seen how in anguish meanings fade away from dasein. By taking away others, dasein remains alone with himself. Anguish thus removes what is between my authentic self and I, removes that averageness from what is being my authentic self, and myself.

Dasein is like sleeping, in an ontic sleep, reported to be a thing and dispersed. Tranquillity is also artificial, and hide a deeper uneasiness. Anxiety, anguish, is not only an oppressive feeling, but is like an eagle taking back dasein from it's fall to himself.
