

Yesterday we introduced the concept of "dasein". It evokes the participation of the human being in the being. We said that Heidegger returns to the question of being.

Besides this, there is no-thing, which is the same thing as ni-ente (no entities).

Yesterday we mentioned that science says "Water is H_2O ", and Heidegger clarified that the question of being had already been considered resolved by other philosophers, who save in "being" the reality. They were animated by curiosity, but this problem had stuck there with that solution since then. The entire western philosophical tradition never questioned the idea that being was ...

Even today, all the scientific studies rest upon the idea that is all those form of knowledge concerned with entities forgets about what the being of those entities actually is. Heidegger says that philosophy has the task of bringing back the question to life. In order to know what being is, he doesn't setup a laboratory (like a scientist), but observes phenomenologically, starting from himself (what it's available). This idea, the idea of "sensus", is the search of the meaning that happens through our senses (sight, hearing, etc.). This concept will be useful when speaking about intelligence.

Human intelligence is not situated only in the brain, but it's connected to the world through peripheric branches of the senses. The fact that we're living as mortal creatures, shapes and structures our intelligence from within.

Heidegger proposes to understand being from our being there, and opening an access to it. He starts from himself, as we said.

Bulding labs, designing microscopes, are other ways of knowing, but they can only address particular entities, and not bring itself to the totality of being. Only philosopher can access to the totality of being. Heidegger states that philosophy wakes us from our ontic sleep. He says that we're lost in the idea that everything is a thing, and little by little we start thinking that we're things too. Philosophy wakes us from the idea that we're beings equals to entities, and otherwise nothing.

In order to discuss how these entities that we're, how we appear, we must identify those conditions that recur in its manifestation, that we might recognize as valid for ourselves. Rather than being something that we have to understand (to be underneath, dominated by this knowledge, obeying some kind of law), this philosophy wants to be discovered by our thought, and recognised in some form. This primary structures of existance are called existential. He says that dasein is always in-der-welt-sein, which means "being in the world". What does it mean?

"In" specifically is not representative of a place, it's not simply that the world is a container, and dasein is placed inside it. Being in the world refers to the idea that each of us are already immersed in a network of meanings, and practical references that we didn't create, but inherited. So, "in" is referred to "habitare", so to have habits, and the world becomes familiar to us through experience and practice. Which world are we talking about? The world inhabited by humans, is not the same of the one of other beings, it's a technically arranged environment, where others are originally present. Human beings cannot live the world itself like other beings do, we need to get this environment ready for us. Technique is not just technology, we need an instrument that can have various shapes, to live our life (e.g. a stick, algorithms).

What kind of world do we inhabit today? Is it still a real world, or do we have shifted to another dimension?

All activities (living, working, etc.) have largely migrated into digital platforms, leaving the physical world empty. What transformation is producing this form of being in the world? Even though Heidegger described dasein as a singular, he identifies as a second existential the presence of others. So, dasein is always a "mit-sein", which translates to "being with". How can we justify this statement?

Relationships with others are not something that we acquired in a second moment after we're born, they (the others) are present since the beginning, and the reason we're alive and here now, is because someone took care of us while we could not do that ourselves. The dasein has to be brought here by the others. This original condition of being with others can be problematic, as others, according to Heidegger, may become a refugee that keeps us away from our anguish, and from our authentic life. The others are an excuse, we find a shelter in others, following them, but also following the most common idea and interpretation, making us feel part of something, but also shrinking our identity.

Before being in the world, dasein was not da (~~da~~ sein). The fact that at certain point, dasein appears into the world, is because of geworfenheit, the third existential. We translate this concept as "gettatezza" (seek english word), it's the inescapability condition where each of us has been thrown, cast, without choosing that.

The fact we've come to life it's not something we've decided, but we still need to face the consequences of living. There is then an initial astonishment where the humans come in contact of reality that he is not aware of, but little by little he will get used to it. Heidegger conducts an ontological inquire, and not a theological one.

We didn't choose our family, body, etc. Throwness, therefore, is that the initial situation that distinguish all of us, conditioning us. Heidegger says that it doesn't determine us completely. The dasein, that each one of us is, can never be understood in a stable way, because every dasein is a "sein-können", a being that is able to be.

Dasein is an entity whose constant trait is the absence of constant traits. We're an entity open to possibilities, therefore oriented towards sensus, in the double meaning of significance and directions, beyond what instincts have already provided for us.

Some said that it's not true there is a sharp dichotomy between human beings and animals. They also have languages, feelings, etc. Every living being, almost certainly experience these conditions, but in its own way. Differently from humans, other creatures do not feel the need after experiencing something, to write poetry about it, issue a law, or things like that. Not to make a revolution, changing the course of history to reach another direction.

Since bees have existed, there've been queen bees and worker bees, but worker bees have never declared a strike, or things like that.

Many religions arise in response to the deep human needs. Humans feel "ek-sisten", so be outside of the harmony.

We must therefore introduce, beside the passive condition of dasein (rooted in the past), another condition, a dynamic one, that projects to the fact that the being is not yet, but may become. Dasein exists in the sense that in the act of understanding and interpreting what he sees, he surpasses every time what he used to be, in the dynamism of what he's able to be. How dasein behaves, the mode of him is never that of reality, but the one of possibility.

For Heidegger, each of us is thrown into the world, yet at the same time each of us has a task to be a project, so something that we must throw. Heidegger calls this "geworfen entwurf". Geworfen is the past participle of thrown,wurf and worf have the same roots. In this dimension, we can grasp the dynamic movements of dasein. It throws himself in the future, projecting his life with appropriate possibilities. A project is something that we throw in front of us. What is the difference between a project and a program? "Pro" means "in front" (for project), while the other "pro" means before. A project is something we throw in front of us, we have clear where we want to go, but not how. A program, instead, is something that it's already been written. All the passages are settled, and we cannot change the elements of a program. A project can be modelled during the way. Since from the beginning, dasein that projects his existence, is aware of something, that all his possibilities will one day be swept away by the realization of the final and most certain possibility: death. In this sense, dasein is motivated by its finitude. We're not just thrown, but we also feel our thrownness. We feel situated, and that our being here is a condition of passivity. Heidegger says that it's not only situated, but also dominated by its affectivity and emotion. This condition is called the "befindlichkeit", where "find" means "to find", and this situation specifically "to find situated". Also, "heit" and "keit" are, in Italian, the end of the word "-ità". Contrary to what philosophers believed for a long time, affectivity is not an accident, so something that concerns Dasein incidentally, but it's an existential framework. Emotions are personal and universal ways to live. They're the true colours of being, when we experience it. Emotions colour our experience of life. Everything appears to us always within a certain emotional ?, with fear, anxiety, etc.

When it comes to understanding, Dasein does it from within its situated feeling in the world. We don't have an aseptic disinterest in subject, but the Dasein feels its own thrownness, and moves within everyday life. The subject of science is deprived of its uniqueness and subjectivity.

Now, what is the purpose of being in time for Heidegger? He says that the subject is a "chimera"/illusion of the metaphysics. Metaphysics is the study of being as seen according to traditional philosophy. The subject is thus understood in two different ways, but for Heidegger they're both wrong.

The first one is the sub-jectum. Jectum is the same of being thrown. It's the guarantee of the metaphysics. The second, the subject is considered as an autonomous and unconditional being. Heidegger denies this idea by asking where is the independent sovereign subject. Is this solid foundation really solid? The subject, for him, is nothing more than the dream of the metaphysics to eliminate the temporality in life. To eliminate time from being, and therefore to forget the finitude. Subject, from the traditional metaphysics, is something static, without feelings.

Where is the subject if the Dasein does not dispose of its "da"? As we're already thrown, from start. The break with traditional philosophy is radical. Dasein, in its temporality, moves into the world according to his emotions, and seeking to understand its condition.

This dimension of knowing comes after another dimension, understanding. So, this is another existential, the "verstehen". Understanding comes before knowing and knowledge. Knowing, scientifically, is a secondary mode that occurs when Dasein dresses itself as the subject. When he tries to take a disinterested look, and know something.

Our relation to think is rarely interpretative is a metaphysical posture that Heidegger considers wrong. We first experience things like children do, until they acquire mastery.

We move in a world that is already pre-understood. Entities do not present themselves within their nakedness, this is another metaphysical abstract. As we're thrown in a specific time and situation, we have a prior understanding of entities.

There is a strong reference within the idea of exchange that Dasein has in the environment, related to the use of hands.

Now, we should ask ourselves what is becoming our world, where all the manual activities are disappearing. We remain with just a finger, which has the origin "digit" in Latin, so digital.
